I spoke with the reporter this afternoon.

I said the boulders were placed there for 2 primary reasons: to protect the safety of folks in a high-traffic area – we don't want pedestrians near the vehicles; and to keep the bike path clear.

Hey Edgar,

Thanks so much for chatting with me. If you have a point person that you'd recommend to ask about those boulders in the Hairball (here's more on that story: <https://missionlocal.org/2017/12/defensive-boulders-arrive-at-a-cleared-sf-homeless-encampment/>) please let me know.

Thanks again!

Hey Rachel,

Thanks for the email, and hey, Edgar.

The piece I'm writing is about "defensive design" or "hostile architecture" when it comes to designing city spaces, and I noticed that there was a bit in the plans for the Castro library. But I'm also interested in looking at the unique challenges that have to be navigated when coming up with those design elements throughout other spaces in the city. That would be the line of questioning, more than specifics about the Castro library. That was just the example that popped out to me.

Thanks so much. Let me know when is a good time.

Hi Rick. San Francisco City Architect Edgar Lopez will be available to talk with you. He can provide both project details and big picture. I am adding him to this email so you can contact him directly to set up a day and time. Meanwhile, any more specifics you're looking for?

Feel free to contact me, too, if you need anything.

Best regards,

Hey Jasmine and Rachel,

Does anyone at SFPW have a chance to chat this week?

Hey Jasmine,

I'm writing a series for the New York Times Styles' section about architectural design, and was wondering if you might be able to speak about the unique challenges when it came to designing the proposed redesign of the Eureka Branch SF Public Library.
